YouTube is offering a new monetization model for Shorts to combat TikTok. But creators who have built businesses on the Alphabet-owned social media platform say the biggest money opportunity remains in longer videos.

The change comes at a crucial time for YouTube, after its revenue fell short of estimates in the most recent quarter, amid a pullback in advertising spending. "MrBeast is huge on long-form video but Shorts becomes a huge discovery engine," said Rene Ritchie, YouTube's creator liaison. "The revenue from Shorts is probably not huge, but the amount of attention they get that drives back to his main content, make them an incredible awareness vehicle even for somebody even at his current size. Shorts is just so powerful for discovery," Ritchie said.

The Creativity Program Beta is aimed at rewarding creators who post videos longer than one minute and provides enhanced creator tools to those who meet the eligibility criteria. The program, which is a separate fund targeting established creators, promises higher rewards and is part of TikTok's ongoing efforts to attract and retain top content creators.

"I think Facebook put a lot of effort into trying to replicate the TikTok experience," said V Spehar, host of "Under the Desk News," a short-form news show with nearly 3 million followers on TikTok.

The most successful creators, like MrBeast and Benedetto, aren't relying on any of the platforms directly for their biggest revenue opportunities, with various methods for creators to monetize their content through partnering with brands, licensing deals and selling their products through e-commerce.
