Majority trust Amazon reviews. The survey of 2,001 Americans who'd made at l east one purchase on Amazon in the past six months, found that while price was t he "biggest factor" in their decision-making, reviews were also a sign ificant consideration. (Nearly 90 percent of consumers read reviews before makin) Tj T* BT

Asked about the trustworthiness of reviews on Amazon, 75 percent of respondents indicated they "fully" or "somewhat" trusted them. Just unde r 21 percent said they only trust verified purchaser reviews and a tiny 4 percent said they don't trust Amazon reviews "at all."

Why you should care. Amazon and the FTC have periodically gone after fake review s and those selling or soliciting them. However those efforts have been ad hoc a nd not ongoing. Amazon and Google, which also has its own fake reviews problem, have no liability for fake reviews on their platforms and thus limited incentive s to systematically crack down.

Given the importance of reviews, there will be continuing incentives on the part of unscrupulous sellers to try and cheat the system, which harms honest merchan ts. Amazon may also be disinclined to take a much stronger or more public stand against fake reviews because it could call attention to the problem and make con sumers more cautious about the site. It will therefore probably be left to the F

TC to address the problem with isolated and incomplete enforcement efforts.
