The odds are including their profit margin.

For some people, this problem might not seem so serious.

You don't have to be a math mastermind.

No matter what kind of effects it can have on your life, being addicted to something is like chains around your neck.

No matter who wins, if the bookmaker can correctly define odds, you will lose money in the long run.

A woman who tried to send $30,000 to a fake boyfriend in the United States refused to believe bank staff who told her she had been scammed.

"She provided a faked letter purporting to be from the United Nations demanding a payment of $30,000 to secure a new surgeon to replace him and to pay for his travel out of Afghanistan so that he could come and live with her in New Zealand.

She did not believe bank staff who tried to tell her she was being scammed and continued to transfer money to the scammer. The bank applied lower transfer limits to her account to try to stem the losses.

"These scams are meticulously built over many months, with the scammer creating what feels like a totally genuine and real relationship and strong emotional bond with their victim before they pull off the scam itself," Kai Fong said.

Kai Fong said that with the country in lockdown, more people were online and there was an increased risk of falling victim to scams.

"But instead of a clever new investment product delivering them riches at the other end, there is a scammer taking their money and giving them nothing in return," he said.

Cryptocurrencies were also beginning to show up in other scams as the scammers rely on its anonymity and lack of regulation to extract stolen money.
