New rules to make fake reviews illegal

The government has announced enhanced powers for the Competition and Markets Authority (CMA), including plans to "stamp out" fake reviews by making it illegal to pay someone to write or host a fake review.

The government is consulting on a new law against commissioning someone to write or submit a fake review, hosting consumer reviews without taking reasonable steps to check they are genuine, and offering or advertising to submit, commission or facilitate fake reviews.

These new measures will come into effect following Parliamentary approval. "Subscription traps", in which businesses make it difficult to exit a contract, will also be stopped.

The new measures will apply in England, Scotland and Wales. Consumer protection is devolved in Northern Ireland.

On mergers, to reduce bureaucracy and keep the burden on smaller businesses to a minimum, the government will exclude mergers between small businesses where each party's UK turnover is less than £10m from the CMA's merger control. The government is also improving the CMA's ability to review killer acquisitions, where big businesses snap up prospective rivals before they can launch new services or products.

UK Hospitality chief executive Kate Nicholls said: "We welcome these moves, which will help create a more level playing field for both businesses and consumers. In particular, we recognise that enhanced powers for the CMA will help stamp out the practice of fake reviews, which do irreparable damage to businesses. We therefore believe it is imperative that online review platforms be required to act and remove malicious and false reviews where appropriate.
