It is the end of a long week, and you find yourself at home wishing you had some thing to do. But, tired of being a fifth wheel to all of your friends in relatio nships, you decide it is time to join the millions of other people who are onlin e looking for a date. Unfortunately, some of those millions may not be real peop le after all. Is it legal for dating sites to use fake content to lure in new me mbers?

There are literally hundreds of different online dating sites now, ranging from simple social networking type sites to actual matchmaking services to mail-order bride/groom sites, and everything in between. With so many options, competition can be fierce. Of course, the best way for sites to compete is by showing lots of attractive and responsive members online; people not afraid to strike up a co onversation and get the ball rolling for romance. So, what better way for a websi te to put the proverbial thumb on the scales to convince you to use their servic e than by creating fake profiles and sending fake messages?

When and how the FTC may pursue these sites remains unclear. As always, the best policy is to follow one's instincts and common sense. If you are instantly bombarded by emails upon making a free dating profile on a site that requires yo u to pay a fee to read or respond to emails, or if you notice an unusually high number of attractive singles in your area, you might be on a site engaging in su ch practices. Unfortunately, it is not clear how one can protect themselves agai nst these practices other than by sticking to larger, more mainstream sites that
