One of the more popular games on the casino floor right now is Everi's Smokin' Hot Stuff Super Wheel.

Traditional common knowledge about slots is that generally speaking, if a slot shows the outcomes you didn't pick, it was a fair pick, or true pick, and you had complete control over the outcome of the bonus; the odds of winning one thing over another only has to do the odds of picking one over the other.

This bonus shows the outcomes.

Given that, and given the pitchforks could remove lower progressives, the chances of winning the Grand are a bit better than 1 in 6.

So, the alternative is they show everything else but it's not real.

So what does Everi say? Slot Queen got to preview some successor machines that carry over this same bonus during G2E in October.

So how and why can they show the reveal of the unpicked choices despite it being predetermined? It turns out that gaming regulations didn't require that preetermined picks not show the other outcomes, in markets where the game was approved, at the time the game was made.

The game is a pretty fun one; if you're more familiar with it, check out Ran-domSlots' video of the game, which includes a bonus with a Mini progressive
